

The Secret of the Whispering Lighthouse

In the sleepy coastal town of Saltwater Cove, there stood a lighthouse that hadn't shone its light in fifty years. Twelve-year-old Leo, a boy with a pocket full of sea glass and a heart full of curiosity, always felt that the lighthouse was watching him.

One misty Tuesday, Leo decided to find out why. He climbed the winding, rocky path to the top. As he reached the heavy oak door, he didn't need to knock—it creaked open as if it had been waiting for him. Inside, the air smelled of salt and ancient books. He climbed the spiraling stairs until he reached the lantern room. There, he didn't find a light-bulb, but a massive, shimmering Star-Crystal resting on a pedestal.

When Leo touched it, the lighthouse hummed. A voice—soft and musical like the tides—echoed in his mind. “The stars have been forgotten by the town below,” the lighthouse whispered. “Only a child who remembers the stories of the night sky can wake me.”

Leo closed his eyes and began to recite everything he knew about the constellations—Orion the Hunter, the dancing Pleiades, and the great Cassiopeia. As he spoke, the crystal pulsed with golden light. The beam shot out across the ocean, not to guide ships, but to project giant, sparkling constellations into the clouds for the whole town to see. From that night on, Saltwater Cove was never sleepy again. Every time the town grew too busy or forgot to look up, the lighthouse would whisper, reminding them that magic was always waiting just above the horizon.
